Focus Asia 2018

The Far East Film Festival is thrilled to welcome to Udine the 150 international, Asian and Italian film industry professionals taking part in FOCUS ASIA 2018! After the big success of the second edition in 2017 with the launch of the first all genres project market dedicated to projects with co-production or co-financing potential in Asia or Europe, FOCUS ASIA renews its programme and launches new exciting initiatives for film professionals from both sides of the world.

Along with the project market, where 14 selected teams from 12 different countries will have the opportunity to meet with leading decision makers, producers and financiers, FOCUS ASIA 2018 will include a rich programme of panels and case studies on the most recent trends and challenges of the international film industry. From a specific focus on distribution in the fragmented Asian landscape and the massive rise of TV series in both continents, to the vast opportunities for remakes and product placement.

FOCUS ASIA 2018 will also feature a brand new initiative called Get Ready for Cannes, where a fine selection of international sales agents from all over the world will have the opportunity, showing trailers and short clips, to introduce their most recent line up – in particular their upcoming market screenings for Cannes - to all Asian and European attending buyers.

The programme will keep the same philosophy as last year: encouraging creative and artistic co-productions and facilitating the distribution of all genres films in both the Asian and European markets.

We look forward to seeing you very soon here in Udine to celebrate with us the 20th edition of the Far East Film Festival!

Synopsis

Renowned painter Thong commits a questionable suicide and his daughter Ruja, the only remaining family member, returns home from France after 17 long years. Her husband TIM whom she remarried only a year ago seems astonished to find out about Ruja’s background and her 6-year old daughter Bell is fascinated by the huge mansion they have arrived at. After the funeral, Ruja rushes to go back but feeling her family’s excitement living in their homeland, she decides to stay for a little while. Ruja hires a new housemaid Nui to manage the mansion and slowly begins to settle in. From then on however, weird things start to happen around the mansion. Nui claims to have seen a ghost in A Portrait of a Beauty, the final and unfinished painting of Thong, and points out that a curse originated from the painting. Although Ruja doesn’t believe her at first, she too experiences strange paranormal activities and begins to believe in the painting’s curse. Wanting to lift the nasty curse and uncover the dark secret behind the painting, Ruja has to come face to face with a shocking truth.
Director’s Note

Beauty often comes from brutal, cold-blooded, and dreadful background. Life is beautiful because we know it will end indeed. Light can shine more brightly and beautifully when the darkness is present. I believe this is what the film A Portrait of a Beauty wants to deliver about the painful truth about beauty. A beautiful painting of a woman fascinating outwardly has a terrific backstory that reveals the dark side of every human connected to it, thus proving the ugliness of human nature. Another interesting part lies in its genre that excellently blends horror, thriller and drama along with intriguing twists. Combining classic thriller elements with trendy tastes as shown in hit genre films such as Rebecca (1940), The Others (2001), and Get Out (2017), A Portrait of a Beauty will impress audiences with its novel and entertaining storytelling that is relatable at the same time.

Synopsis

Ria Salvacion goes to the strange and mysterious Bethlehem Hospital to give birth. That night, the hospital transforms into hell on Earth. The dead come back to life, patients are possessed by an unknown force, and a dark cult attacks with intentions of taking the baby. Three strangers, each gifted with their own unique skill, find themselves drawn to the hospital as well. There is Kaio, the prodigious boy detective with cancer; Jo, the transgender sorcerer; and sister Luisa, the nun with a shotgun. Caught in the middle of the hellstorm, they form an unlikely alliance in order to save the child, and hopefully with it, the world.
Director’s Note

We wrote Belen with the intention of making a no holds barred fun, gory, tongue-in-cheek horror film, something that’s never been done in our country. Inspired by movies such as Sam Raimi’s The Evil Dead and Drag Me to Hell, Belen aspires to be the filmic equivalent of a roller coaster ride. The religious overtones are pretty apparent: Ria being a representation of Mother Mary and her husband King being Joseph. Kaio the cancer boy genius, sister Luisa the nun with a shotgun and Jo the transgender witch are modern takes on the three wise men. Dr. Tinto could be perceived as a perverted take on the angel Gabriel. Having said that, the political undertones stay subtle: how our country keeps banking on false messiahs, and how one side always tries to destroy the other (leading to our own eventual apocalypse).

Quark Henares is a multi-awarded film, television, TV commercial and music video director. Synopsis
Around 150 years ago in pre-Westernized Japan, on a mountain battered by driving snow, a man (Shusuke Maeda) comes across a black cow. He somehow succeeds in leading the reluctant animal back to his home, and begins living with it. The man and the cow work together to cultivate the wilderness. Although their partnership goes far from smoothly at first, they gradually develop a rapport in the midst of their forgiving natural surroundings, and turn the plains into fields.

The man cuts grass and gives it to the cow. They bathe together in a river. The man arranges for the cow to mate with another in a neighboring village. It seems as if their quiet life will go on forever.

Everything gets better after man brought cow, so villager start thought the cow is the god. But one night, the village volcano erupted...
Director's Note

Over 85% of Japanese “Wagyu” cattle, including the Matsuzaka, Kobe, and Omi breeds, are descended from the Tajima cow, which could also be described as the progenitor of the Japanese Black breed. The Tajima strain was brought into being 150 years ago in the Edo period by a man named Shusuke Maeda.

He devoted his life to creating a sturdy breed of cattle that would generate wealth for his fellow villagers, and ensure they did not suffer unduly from famine and natural disasters. I believe they are now the antithesis of modern energy sources, and represent the ongoing history of Westernization. However, cattle became less important with the emergence of the automobile. They are also fundamentally connected to the Japanese people’s loss of their worship of nature, as evidenced by today’s environmental problems and the nuclear issue.

Pierce Conran / Producer

Director’s Note

Taking inspiration from the assassination of North Korean leader Kim Jong-un’s half-brother at the Kuala Lumpur International Airport, Bully Basher combines the female spy-action genre with school-set youth drama and romance, while also blending in modern racial overtones, touching on themes national identity and mass immigration. Yoo-Jung will be played by a well-known figure from the music field in Korea. After shooting several projects across Asia, Director Lee Sang-woo and Producer Pierce Conran are keen to explore new cinematic avenues with a unique Korean-European co-production. The location of Bully Basher is currently London and the English countryside but the narrative could easily be shifted to several Western European nations, which are also tackling themes pertaining to the rise of nationalism and negative public opinions on immigration.

Director’s Profile

Since Tropical Manila, Lee Sang-woo’s dark and controversial films have earned him wide acclaim at festivals. His works Father Is A Dog and Barbie earned prizes from the Black Movie Film Festival in Geneva and the Giffoni and Gijon International Film Festivals. Frequently exploring taboo themes within dysfunctional family dynamics, Lee's films exhibit a raw style as they dig at the heart of Korean society, but not without humor, empathy and beauty in the most unexpected of places. Lee is currently working on the HBO Asia horror series Folklore. He is the first Korean director to work with HBO.

Company Profile

Formed in 2014 by Director Lee Sang-woo and Producer Pierce Conran, 2Mr Films is a production company specializing in dark genre/drama titles in Korea. Synopsis

At the death of her beloved husband, 80-year-old Marie wants to keep living alone in her isolated house in the Swedish countryside. This turns out to be quite a challenge for her only child Jakob, a hard-working middle-aged engineer living quite far away with his family. Jakob works for a cybernetics company where he has developed a dog robot designed to be used for care and company - CAR:Y. He decides to let his mother test a prototype, in order to give her some support and make up for the fact that he can’t visit her so much. At first, Marie rejects the mechanical pet, but it’s a fascinating little being, so well-designed that it seems gifted with an own thinking and intelligence. Marie starts to appreciate her new friend and without noticing it, she gets increasingly attached to it. As the bond gets stronger, Marie notices strange details that make her suspect the unbelievable: that her late husband is trying to communicate with her through the robot. Meanwhile, Jakob’s wife Jenny witnesses frightening incidents that convince her that something is not right with the robot. Could he have an own agenda and pose a real threat?
Director's Note

What will happen when robots will succeed to let us believe they are gifted with their own thoughts and emotions? What happens to us, falling willfully for this illusion? Through a simple and universal story centered on the relation between a little therapeutic dog robot and an old woman, I want to question our over-reliance on technology as a substitute to human contact, as well as the growing lack of communication between people and especially between generations.

CAR:Y connects with the old Scandinavian tradition of supernatural and nature mysticism and mixes it with high-technological elements, in a way that is reminiscent of modern Asian cinema. It’s a genre film of a serious kind, putting characters and emotions first. Its tone will be realistic and low-key, heavy on atmosphere, slowly building up a sense of threat and danger and blurring the lines between reality and illusion.

Director's Note

Over the last sixty years or so, no Chinese writer except Mr. Liu Yichang, has depicted the post-war Hong Kong society and the materialistic and spiritual lives of the Hong Kong Chinese with such vividness and profundness. The Drunkard, which he published in 1963, has many elements of gambling. Yes, Chinese people love eating, and also gambling! A short story, also entitled The Drunkard, which Mr. Liu wrote in 1959, published on Nanyang Commercial Daily in Singapore, is actually the story of a gambler. It’s befitting that The Gamblers of Hong Kong will follow on from The Drunkard, the second part of a Portraits of Hong Kong trilogy.

In the Next Life

A 13 year-old orphan living in the slums of Phnom Penh, Cambodia investigates her friend’s past life visions, uncovering a sinister conspiracy of literal, scientific reincarnation.

Project Information
- country: USA, Cambodia
- producer: Valerie Steinberg

- writer: Christopher Larsen
- genre: Sci-Fi, Thriller, Mystery
- total budget: 500,000 €
- financing in place: 200,000 €

Synopsis
Phnom Penh, Cambodia. Near Future. The rich are “augmented” with brain-machine interfaces. The CIA is recruiting poor Cambodians to fight their shadow war with North Korea. The public internet was shut down long ago... But the slum of Tralop Bek remains largely unchanged. Srey Leak is a whip-smart 13 year-old orphan, who dreams of escaping Tralop Bek to study in America. She trusts no one and looks out only for herself. But she loves solving mysteries, so she agrees to help Leng Heng, a boy in her class beset by past-life visions of being fabulously wealthy. Together, they dissect his visions to try to find the location of a possible buried treasure, spurring a scavenger hunt across Phnom Penh and into the past. What they find is a far-reaching scientific conspiracy beyond their wildest dreams. Faced with these strange new truths, the two kids must decide how far they are willing to go to get their “treasure”...

Director’s Note
In the Next Life was directly borne of insights I gained teaching a year-long course in filmmaking to youth in Tralop Bek, a slum in Phnom Penh. Onscreen depictions of slum life, such as Slumdog Millionaire, often parade a litany of heinous sufferings (we might call it “poverty porn”), encouraging us to root for the protagonist to escape their plight (and by extension, their community) — the ultimate individualist, capitalist fantasy. In Tralop Bek, I saw how this sensational, pity-inducing portrait is inaccurate — these communities encompass wisdoms and joys that are completely unaccounted for by urban development. Yet the inexorable “march of progress” threatens to transform these cultures. Ultimately, this story is a clarion call for more empathy and understanding for the disenfranchised, as we hurtle ever faster into a more homogenized, consumerist, and connected future.

His Phnom Penh-set short film The Foreigner Here premiered at the Cambodian International Film Festival alongside the works of a new wave of young Cambodian directors. He now calls Phnom Penh his second home.

Director's Note

At the early stage of this project development, in fact, we have significantly been inspired by one of Asia’s most-acclaimed classic literary gems; The Story of Khun Chang and Khun Pan, which has been favored among many generations of Thai people for century. However, this time, the classic story is going to be retold though various aspects of the postmodern sensibility and the essence of nostalgia, by combining characteristics of being bold, modern, straightforward with being soft, delicate, imbricate, which recreates the familiar identity but still contemporary. Hence, this film is not just another cliché folktale portrayal, but in fact, it is aimed as parody and revisit of this popular story through the perspective of nowadays.

Director's Profile

Having been labelled as one of the most-acclaimed filmmakers from Thailand during this decade, Kongkiat Khomsiri first entered the film industry in 2000 as scriptwriter and assistant to several famous Thai filmmakers including Apichatpong Weerasethakul and Thanit Jitnukul. In 2005, as part of Ronin Team, he made his directorial debut with Art of the Devil 2, followed by his solo works, especially Chaiya and Slice, as well as notable writing credit from Wisit Sasanatieng’s The Unseeable. Recently, his previous film Take Me Home was also featured in Far East Film Festival 19.

Consciousness can only be transformed. A suicide attempt pushes memory to a parallel plane of existence, ensuring that one lives on forever another reality. Here, Hikaru is given a chance to apologize to Amaya.

Meanwhile, Hikaru with a cap delivers the pills and is forced to kill Masao, who has cheated Juro in the past.

A chase between Hikaru without a cap and Juro’s men leads Hikaru to swallow a pill — causing his consciousness to invade that of Hikaru with a cap. He pulls away from Masao and kills Juro. Hikaru rushes to his client and convinces her to abandon her suicide attempt. He looks on as the wind takes his cap to the city below.
Director's Note

I want to make the ultimate escapist film using the science fiction genre. Our protagonist is lost in the complex social structure of Tokyo. His alienation is clear in a foreign city filled with the decadent youth. Quantum Suicide pushes the concept of escapism by using death as a device to correct mistakes by jumping to parallel universes. The ultimate form of escapism is to push your own consciousness out of your very existence. It is to travel to different realms of possibilities and correct past mistakes. In the end, the film subverts this by highlighting an anti-suicide stance. Running away is never the answer. One must face their demons and responsibilities.

Synopsis

Recurrence is a supernatural thriller about Una (22 y.o.), whose son (4 y.o.) disappeared years ago and is presumed dead. After a suicide attempt, a sinister creature appears and Una starts to live a parallel story that happened a hundred years ago, a story of another Una, of rape, violence and murder.

Director’s Note

Una is about violence against women and the aftermath of the violence and how it can linger throughout the ages, in our families’ histories, in the memories of our cells. The shame comes with the violence: the shame of the victim, the shame of the perpetrator and the shame of those who stand idly by. We have the silencing of justice: how we pretend we can cover up the past, sweep it under the carpet, put on a fake smile and pretend nothing happened. In Una there is so much guilt: the guilt born of violence in the victim, the guilt of the mothers and fathers and the children who suffer needlessly because guilt has been placed in their innocent souls. And so we must repeat the cycle of violence until we break the silence, acknowledge the shame and come to terms with the guilt. Una is a film in the vein of Polanski and Del Toro, an uncomfortable journey into darkness, not a slasher.

Synopsis

The Tunnel is a thriller drama, where a catastrophic fire erupts in a tunnel going over the mountain pass in the fjords of Norway. It is a project that explores the different reactions to survival in extreme circumstances.

The rugged snow plough drivers on the west coast of Norway are keeping the roads open through the Christmas weekend. Driver Stein is working to keep the traffic flowing through the tunnel over the mountain pass. Suddenly a tanker carrying petrol hits the tunnel wall and comes to a full stop. The driver is quick to react and notifies the State Highway Authorities. But the developing blizzard outside makes it impossible for the fire department to reach the tunnel. When the tanker erupts in flames, it’s up to the local snow plough drivers to give the local fire brigade safe passage up to the tunnel. Inside the tunnel the survivors are fighting a desperate struggle to get out. Stein discovers that his daughter is on a bus stuck in the tunnel, but the local firefighters will not enter the tunnel before the ventilation fans clear the smoke enough so they can search for survivors.
Director's Note

I grew up in a village on the west coast surrounded by tall mountains and deep fjords. In order to drive my dear family from Bergen “home” for Christmas we have to drive through well over a hundred small and large mountain tunnels that effectively connect our region. They are old and recently been found to have structural weaknesses that can cost a lot of human lives. How long can such a system of obvious weaknesses be maintained? Is appearance more important than security? The Tunnel is not a political movie, but a character-driven and emotional genre film that also allows to ask such questions between the lines.
With The Tunnel we want to make a disaster film in which the human character drama is in focus. Disasters in movies are an exciting arena and the fiction is a good laboratory for exploring human behavior in extreme situations.

By the market's entrance, Sud spots a billboard ad where he sees a picture of Chula having dinner with her family. We learn that Sud don't have anyone to talk about suicide bombing, so he had made up a fake character who he could talk about his inner struggle.

Director's Note

Sud's family comes across an opportunity to confront the idea of poverty as their youngest comes back to them from the hands of the terrorist group. Each family member struggles to fight against the fierce reality of poverty but no one is able to escape free from it. In contrast to the harsh reality that his entire family has been trying to overcome, Sud comes across a chance to fall in love with a girl of his dreams and spend a dreamlike day with her. However, we discover that the girl, Chula, was only a figment of his imagination to avoid the unforgiving reality that he could not escape from otherwise. Sud suffers a series of events that were too big for such a small child to handle and suffers through PTSD (posttraumatic Stress Disorder) after Sud thinks he killed his friend in this film. is a mature rather than other characters in film.

Synopsis

Emory is struggling to make ends meet when his absent father returns home, deeply in debt. Raring for revenge, his mother warns him from turning into his father, who is never satisfied with the things he has - comparing him to the Tarob, a greedy monster of Dusun lore who swallows the sun. During an eclipse, their ancestors would bang brass gongs and cry out wishes, hoping that the Tarob will spit the sun out along with their dreams. Emory joins a triad nevertheless, thinking it would get him power and fast money. The anxiety causes animal scales to spread throughout his body with every evil deed. Meanwhile, news reports of a coming eclipse siren throughout the city. Triad boss, Teoh tells the story of the wicked Half-Boy who was borne from the wish from the Tarob and has to go on a journey to find his better half. He bids Emory to kill a man as part of his initiation. Instead, Emory saves the victim but loses his father who fatally shoots himself while hunting. Emory disappears and the city is cast into darkness. He calls his mother later to tell her that he has left on a journey to find his better half. The sun begins to set.

adventures of our city which I could never experience as a young woman. Sabah is the poorest state in Malaysia although it is wealthy in resources, and this film is a criticism of the lack of work opportunities for Sabahan youths. Decades of social engineering under the Federal Government’s policies of Malay supremacy have made ethnic KadazanDusuns vulnerable on our own land, despite being the indigenous majority. Kota Kinabalu, the coastal capital city of Sabah as a setting, deliberately challenges traditional images of indigeneity. Wilderness is not the famed Borneo rainforests but that within, which has allowed us to survive. It is the return to an older identity through a forgotten Dusun folktale.

Synopsis
Young Nikola Tesla (9 y.o.) is a lonely boy who dreams of becoming an inventor. He is obsessed with his inventions, despite they often get him into trouble. One day he notices electricity on his beloved Cat’s fur and gets a fantastic thought: what if the entire Earth is just one giant cat? The one who manages to “pet the Earth”, will produce enormous energy and have a great power. But, just as the idea came to his mind – it gets stolen by the Idea Poachers who travel around the Empire with their equipment for stealing ideas. That night, they sell it to a mad scientist, Professor Wentrcek, who has no ideas of his own. Year after, Idea Poachers come back to Nikola’s small town hoping to snatch more, but it doesn’t turn out as they planned: Nikola follows them and ends up in the Wentrcek’s laboratory where he discovers a mysterious machine developed on his idea.

However, Nikola’s idea is meant for a different purpose: Wentrcek wants to turn it into a “death-ray” and rule the Empire. Nikola persuades the Poachers to help him on his quest of saving the Empire.
Director's Note

Lead by the fact that Tesla already in his early childhood had a vivid visual imagination, we came up with a film that uses real motifs from his early childhood as well as his later life in a fantastic way. Motifs of teleportation, wireless power transfer, creation of a death beam, but also some real events, such as Tesla’s attempt to fly using an umbrella or the fact he came into contact with electricity for the first time through the fur on his cat’s back were used to create a truly fantastic adventure the main character goes through. I want to do this film because it is a story of one of the greatest man in the history of science told from the point of view of a child. What was this genius like when he was eleven years old boy? What were his problems, what were his dreams? These are the questions I like to answer in poetic, fantastic, and I hope, humorous way.

Synopsis

Dzawal, an aboriginal Yami young man, son of fisherman from Orchid Island in East Taiwan seeks a better living a southern seaport city, Kaoshiung. He ends up running errands for a local gangster who engages with illegal foreign labour trading business. Dzawal meets Julio, an injured runaway Filipino fisherman from Batanes Island. They amazingly find that they can communicate in each other’s mother language. Both being outsiders in a foreign place, they quickly become good friends.

Dzawal is also introduced to Julio’s Filipino migrant worker community. Solving fellow migrant workers’ problems, Dzawal, like a local, finds himself useful and can identify with this community. Gradually, Dzawal and Julio’s friendship develops into a unique brotherhood. After a trip to first monument of 23.5°N, Julio asks Dzawal to help him go home. It becomes not only a journey of bringing Julio to his home, but also a journey for Dzawal to bring himself home.
Director's Note

The story was inspired by a book Escape: Our Formosa, Their Prison, a translated collection of letters written on the run by Southeast Asian migrant workers in Taiwan who have run away from their abusive employers, husbands, etc. After doing some research, I found the migrant fishermen’s condition is very similar to early aboriginal fishermen who worked for Taiwanese. I also find an interesting connection between Taiwan aboriginal groups and Southeast Asia. They are more like each other in terms of language and culture even though they are divided into different nationalities. I want to explore this unique friendship shared between Taiwanese aboriginal young man and Filipino migrant worker. It is the universal human affection beyond nationalities and boundaries. The story is also a look at the migrant worker living status in Taiwan from a point of view of an aboriginal young man.

Synopsis

Rakib (19 y.o.) is a film actor who is casted to portray the heroic life of a famous military general named Purna (62 y.o.), who is running a campaign for the mayoral position in his mountainous hometown. Rakib is living in Purna’s house to observe and learn directly from him. One day, Purna finds out that one of his campaign billboards is missing in the village. He takes the incident as a personal offense. Like a loyal dog, Rakib roams the town to find the perpetrator and makes him confess. He manages to find out that it is an ornery boy named Agus. Rakib brings Agus to Purna to apologize. But then the apology goes off track and leads to Agus’ death. Purna shuts Rakib up.

Rakib’s filmmaking journey turns into guilt. Upon befriending the locals, Rakib finds out that everyone in town actually knows that Purna is behind this. They are just afraid to speak up because Purna is a powerful man. Whilst events around Rakib come thicker, the film never loses sight of the bigger picture. Autobiography uses the format of a suspense drama to consider modern conditions in Indonesia, revealing a country that is deeply traumatized by its own history.
Director's Note

I want to make a film about how politics can never outclass humanity. Although the story is set in a political situation, the main character is a human being who tries to claim his humanity through guilt, solace and finally self-acceptance. Autobiography is a suspense drama. I want the camera to serve as a tool of experiencing rather than being a tool of recording. The camera will be loyal to the main character. Everything around him will be carved through a careful crafting of shallow depth of fields and sound design.

This project is personal to me as it sums up my experience of growing up with an authoritative father during Indonesia’s military dictatorship in the 1990s. The protagonist represents me, the antagonist represents my father. The dynamics between them will fuel the story and provide us a glimpse of the bigger picture: a country that is terrified by its own image.

Synopsis

Many stories have been told about the military. Storytellers from David Lean to Francis Coppola have taken a curious audience behind the scenes of this otherwise elusive world. There is a point of view in its long history, though, that has rarely been portrayed. It is the story of military families.

Maria lives on the military base together with her husband Nikolay, the deputy commander, and their son. She desperately anticipates her husband’s transfer back to Russia, dreaming of a life where she and her family will have their own home. Here, having just one bedroom to themselves, the family has no privacy. To Maria it seems, as if everything she does is being monitored by the others under a magnifying glass.

Their son is part of the judo team and coached by Captain Krainov who is strikingly different from Nikolay. Nikolay treats their son just like another soldier. Without realizing what Maria has gotten herself into she becomes engulfed in an emotional storm. The confined and enclosed world of the military base proves that it is impossible to hide anything and quickly not just Maria’s life but the whole community is falling apart.
Director’s Note

I was born into a family whose tradition of military service dates back to the 1800’s. Growing up in the world of the army allowed me to get to know it inside out. While men like my father and grandfather, the officers, were serving for 10-12 hours every day and often went away on missions, I stayed behind and witnessed the world of the officers’ wives. It is only natural that the topic of my first feature would be a personal theme – military families. This film is about traditional family values. We sadly have a divorce rate that has crossed the 50% mark. I want to highlight the importance of family and for the audience to leave this film and treat their family members more carefully. I have always been an admirer of Boris Frumin’s neorealist drama scripts (Street Days, Blind Dates, Oh Lucy!) and was very excited by the opportunity of developing this script with him.

Synopsis

Emy (22 y.o.) & Teresa (20 y.o.), sisters, are living on their own within the Filipino community of Piraeus, Greece. Emy when emotionally overwhelmed she cries blood, a condition inherited from her mother Pilar. Emy is being kept as a secret from the rest of the world. Teresa is everything for Emy. Teresa, a church abiding believer, spends time between the church, work - fish market - and home. She suspects Emy has also inherited her mother’s healing abilities. Emy is not aware of it yet. Could it be used for good, or evil? Would the church exploit her gift? Teresa meets Argyris, a Greek, falls pregnant out of wedlock, and Emy finds out the hard way that her sister will not always be there for her. Emy’s jealousy grows, as her powers, creating a wall between them. Emy has to learn to be independent. She takes her mother’s old job, as the help for a rich Greek old woman running a healing centre, which the Church and Teresa reject. But the centre sees Emy as a divine gift. The person Emy loves most becomes terrified of her. Emy is willing to do whatever it takes to hold on to Teresa’s unconditional love, even sacrificing her divine calling.
Director's Note

The inspiration came from my early memory of my mother fighting cancer and our household invaded by healers. My accidental first visit to a Filipino church moved me. Holy Emy is about believing in something embodied. I envision it to be sensual, suspenseful and mystical. Emy and Teresa become women in a world far away. Teresa struggles to integrate in the Filipino & Greek community. Emy is a creature that doesn’t belong anywhere. The sisters are mirrors of me, the women in my life - their struggle to be good sisters, sexual beings, to find their way and become women. Their universe is superstitious, religious, and spiritual. A key motif is blood. Usually associated with gore and splatter, in this female world blood is a symbol of life, pain, lust and of a miracle. In the final scene, a Holy creature is born, a creature that the world is ready to love and accept.

Synopsis

Mango Avenue is a blistering central artery of Cebu City. Amid the local hustle and bustle, prostitution serves as a source of income for many young women. A single mother in her final college year, Carina, 27, is one of them. Like many single parents around the world, all Carina wants is a better future for her child. She accepts her current fate as a way to keep her daughter, Haley, 7, in school and fed. For years now Carina has always been able to support herself and Haley: moonlighting brings her steady income, she has a friend who looks after her, and a regular client she has grown attached to. There is a part of her that is afraid of change and facing a new reality.

When circumstances push Carina against the wall, and the dangers of her profession threatens her daughter, Carina uncovers strength to fight back. As a result, not only does she find a way to free herself and the ones she loves but she also helps bring down a child prostitution ring. Ultimately Carina comes out of this stronger, in a better position to take care of Haley, and winds up following a passion she never realized she had.
Director's Note

Mango Avenue is a very personal project to me. Its development began from the desire to show the rich and beautiful culture of the Philippines along with the necessity to address a serious social issue tightly intertwined into our society. Following our heroine provides a unique perspective that I think is representative of how we all undergo growth - through adaptation. That’s the central theme of Mango Avenue. It follows characters living in a world that doesn’t care what they become or what happens to them. It’s a world that’s not necessarily built around their needs. Yet somehow they adapt and pull through.

In today’s landscape, when we’re finally getting better chances to bring to the screen female-driven stories and we’ve got the audience that is ready to watch them, it is almost necessary to show those women: struggling and learning, falling and rising, and always moving forward.

Synopsis

Centuries in the future, Scandinavian Union is occupied and ruled by a powerful Eastern military government. It owns and tightly controls all remaining freshwater resources mostly destroyed decades ago by an ecological disaster and a major bio-weapons accident.

In this withered land lives Noria, the only daughter of a Tea Master, who is left alone by her family to guard a deadly secret: the location of a hidden freshwater spring the military cannot know about.

Taro, the new mesmerising commander in the Lappish village wins Noria’s trust, but closes in on her secret behind her back. Noria realizes Taro’s true intentions too late and the poorest are already doomed to die because of the military’s tightened hold on water rations.

Noria must find a way to save her people and her land from total disaster. Refusing to give in her freshwater spring, Noria digs in deeper into her family’s secret. Within the Tea Masters’ books, she finds information that the government’s power is based on lies, that there still might be fresh water left for everyone. She risks her own life and sets out on a dangerous journey to find out if this is true.
Director's Note

Memory of Water is an environmental dystopia, an adventure drama combining a hero’s journey & thriller elements. The film stands for sustainability & ecological values. It talks about courage, loyalty & generosity. The tea culture, brought to the North by Japanese environmental refugees, is the moral backbone of the story. The respect for beauty & harmony, the importance of water and its relation to life & death are in the core of it. I intend to create the futurism with minimalism. The Lapland has a unique wilderness, a bare vast landscape where hardly anything grows. Next to the simple rural world, we do get to take a peek at the more futuristic data based high tech culture too. In terms of cinematography, I refer to Andrea Arnold’s version of the Wuthering Heights. I aim at intimate, close to its characters, moving in the moment kind of camerawork in natural light of the midnight sun.

Synopsis

Pearl receives a phone call about her geologist uncle missing. He works for a gold mining company. The company informs her that his boat capsized while he was performing a survey with his geologist team. It is in an area where Myanmar government and ethnic armed group/party have been in armed conflicts for several decades.

Pearl and her cousin Lynn, travel to a border city on Thailand’s side. Upon arrival, she learns that the company is doing business with a party secretly. They start looking for the missing uncle with the help of exiled students who are taking refuge under the party after 1988 nationwide revolution. The party officer demands to stop searching on land in order not to draw attention.

Finally they find the body on the Thailand side. Now that all hope is lost, she requests to the officer to allow her to take the body back to her family. But the officer demands to burn it on the spot to cover up the news about gold mining under their permission. Tension escalates as she insists on taking the body. But as much as she tries to fulfill the wish of the grieving family, she must also protect the living ones.
Director's Note

The story happens in a conflict zone at the border area. It is about the struggles of a girl and her adventure to find her missing uncle whose boat is capsized in a border area. She enters the territory controlled by the insurgence party. The hope of finding him alive is lost when his body is found. A man may roam around the land when he is alive. But it becomes difficult for him to even cross a river after he is dead. The crisis of carrying the dead body to the other side of the river in real life and the belief that the soul has to cross the river to go to next life are not only similar, they are also metaphor to each other. There are no battles but the tensions among insurgencies in different areas in which they control. I'm mixed race of half Burmese and half ethnic, and I believe that I can take the story to the screen in a faithful presentation to the characters and the real events.

Fiction and reality is blurred when Leonor Reyes, a once popular action film writer during the 80's, falls into an irreversible coma that transports her into the world of her last, unfinished action film script.

Synopsis

Leonor Reyes was the only female writer-director of Pinoy Action movies during the 1970s up to the 80s. All of her films were hits because she managed to make the perfect heroes - characters that the Filipino people embraced at a time under violent dictatorship. However, her career died early after the untimely death of her first son.

Now 72 years old, she lives in a cluttered apartment with all her awards, aged movie posters and her other son Rudie, who has plans of migrating to work abroad. As she ruminates the end of her life, a television set falls on her head that puts her in a coma.

While confined in the hospital, Leonor enters the world that is playing at the lobby TV. She wakes up inside the world of a 1980s Filipino action flick, complete with all that she expected of a macho action movie because it’s her last unfinished screenplay.

Meanwhile, Leonor’s son Rudie and her best friend decide to sell the screenplay to fulfill her dreams as well as to alleviate her medical expenses. At the height of everything, Leonor’s body vanishes into thin air and the line between her action fantasy and unforgiving reality begin to blur.
Director's Note

The mysteries of the Philippines are answered by its history. Not so long ago a famous action star, with no background in governance, became the 13th President of the Philippine Republic. 400 years ago, we fell in love with our colonizers who wanted nothing from us but our land. Today, Trump is the president of the strongest nation in the world. Here I am, wanting to make movies because it allows me to create worlds that I dream of existing. As humans, it is natural to fall in love with our concept of a better life. We chose an action star because we saw ourselves in the characters the hero never ceased to save. We fell in love with intruders because we saw them as symbols of power and perfection. Return Of The Owl is a film about our romantic notions of life — how we fall in love with fiction to the point that it blurs our reality.

Director's Profile

Martika Ramirez Escobar’s love for the bizarre is best reflected through her films and photography. After graduating from the University of the Philippines, her film Stone Heart competed at the 19th Busan IFF. The following year, it won Best Film at the 11th Cinemalaya. Her latest work Quadrilaterals recently had its premiere at the 9th DMZ Docs. She is an alumna of the Berlinale Talents Tokyo, Asian Film Academy, Southeast Asian Film Lab, Luang Prabang Talent Lab and Fantastic Film School. Most of her films are self-reflexive films about her relationship with cinema.

Company Profile

Arkeo Films pursues its work in independent films, the latest of which is Respeto (Alberto Monteras, 2017), a hip hop political film, which screened in Rotterdam (IFFR). Respeto premiered in the Cinemalaya Fest and swept 7 awards including Best Film. It had a nationwide screening and continues to play in schools. Arkeo Films also produced Apocalypse Child by Mario Cornejo, which was considered one of the best local films in 2015. It received major awards at the QCinema Festival including Best Film. It has also won Best Film in Five Flavours Film Festival and Toronto Reel Asian Film Festival. Due to its critical success, the film was released commercially in the Philippines as well as in Poland. Today, the company is pursuing international co-production for its upcoming features - Return of the Owl, Seeing and Alabang Boy - and the development of original content for television and new media.

Wang Cheng is a writer trying to get his next novel published. When he learns that his honest work must be “improved” according to censorship standards, what decision will he take?

Synopsis

Wang Cheng is a young famous writer living in Chongqing, China. He hopes to get his new novel published but faces censorship difficulty, even if his girlfriend, Jia De, works as an editor in a publishing house. The standards and decisions of this institution are indeed controlled by the Chinese censorship office and Wang's novel tells the story of poor thugs whose life is not really exemplary: a gun seller and his female companion, a nightclub singer.

Wang believes in his artistic integrity and wants his novel to reflect important truths about modern Chinese reality. Of course, the publishing house deems his novel unable to be published unless it is substantially “improved” (censored). Jia De aims to influence Wang’s state of mind — and his novel. Situations and characters from Wang’s novel echo those of his reality. And when Wang and Jia argue about the characters of the novel, they indirectly talk about themselves. Wang begins to doubt. Several internal and external struggles put Wang in a position of disappointment and confusion. He’s finally led to make a decision he never wanted to make.

Riddle addresses questions of what can happen to creativity in an oppressive society. My film centres on a writer, Wang, who is working on a novel which cannot be published because it doesn’t meet rigid state censorship requirements. The internal and external conflicts arising from censorship fill Wang with self-doubt. The movie will alternate between scenes from Wang’s “reality” and scenes from his novel. The reality and novel will echo one another, enabling viewers to visualize the writer’s creative struggle and mental conflict. The film will be set in my birthplace, Chongqing, an immense Chinese city that has unique and inspiring things to behold, both natural and man-made, where I shot my first feature film. This city is marked by its array of visual and social contrasts. I’ll use these contrasts to reinforce the protagonist’s struggles in both his reality and the fiction he writes.

Synopsis

Two years after murdering and cannibalizing British student Serena Burgess in Paris, Teppei Hamazaki is freed on technicalities. The Burgess family is devastated. Serena’s little brother Jeremy can’t understand why his family don’t pursue Hamazaki, who is capitalizing on his infamy. Jeremy’s trauma deepens during his teenage years and he ends up in a psychiatric prison. All seems hopeless until he hears an old recording of Serena’s voice. Jeremy completely reforms and is released. “I’m going to Japan”, he tells his shocked parents. Posing as a researcher writing a book on Hamazaki, Jeremy hires Maki as his guide. Frustrated by the slow search for Hamazaki, who’s now an unemployed recluse, Jeremy fires Maki, but her kindness stays with him. As the tenth anniversary of Serena’s death approaches, Hamazaki sparks a media frenzy by announcing his cannibalistic desires have returned. Growing desperate, Jeremy lands in trouble with the police. Maki comes to his aid and is astonished to discover his true identity. At Hamazaki’s comeback celebration, killer and victim finally come face-to-face in an explosive and unpredictable climax.
Director's Note

In 2001, I met an author who related the case of a Japanese man who murdered and cannibalized a foreign student in Europe in the 1980s and was now a free man. The author had co-written books with this person and considered him a friend. While I was familiar with extreme cinema and true crime, it was a defining episode of “culture shock”. I wrote an essay on the episode, which gained attention on the internet and ironically led to overseas producers requesting to interview the killer, forcing me to examine his media glorification. Living in Japan when the murders of British nationals Lucy Blackman and Lindsay Hawker occurred, the frustration victims’ families felt at being disconnected by distance, language, and culture was palpable. Where Wolves Fear to Prey will be a cinematic testament to these experiences and emotions.
